New discoveries in the fields of engineering, robotics, and artificial intelligence (AI) are enabling machines to do things they could never do before. Some people are concerned about the effects that these discoveries may have on human beings. They wonder whether humans will someday depend too much on robots to perform important tasks.

① Other people are embracing robots and the possibilities that they offer. These people realize that robots can free them from repetitive work so that they can spend their time doing more enjoyable things.

② Many people are bringing robots into their lives, and you should, too. The best place to start may be a household robot that can clean the floors in your home.

④ If you have a larger home and carpets or rugs on your floors, then you will need a really tough robot that has plenty of muscle. It should also have a long battery life so that it doesn't stop during a large cleaning job to charge itself. A robot that meets these requirements will cost more but be worth every penny, considering all of the work that it will do for you.
