If you've ever traveled to another country without knowing the language, you know how difficult it is to communicate using just body language. However, have you ever thought that your body language might accidentally offend the other person? Here, let's look at some differences in body language across the world.

In most cultures, nodding your head is a sign of agreement. However, be careful when traveling around Bulgaria and Greece. Nodding your head up and down here actually means "No"! Next, eye contact is considered respectful in Western cultures, especially Spain and Greece. But in Finland and Japan, staring makes people feel awkward. Therefore, eye contact is reserved only for the beginning of a conversation. Another interesting phenomenon is the "goodbye" wave. The American form can actually be confused with "no" in parts of Europe and Latin America, while the Italian version could mean "come here" to some Americans. Lastly, sitting with your legs crossed is common in North America and some European countries, but in the Middle East, showing the sole* of your shoe to another person is a huge no-no!

Be careful to avoid these cultural slip-ups next time you visit a foreign country—you may end up offending someone without ever saying a word!

四、混合題(素養題)(每題 2 分，共 4 分)

Josh and Martha are sitting in a café, exchanging their travel experiences.

Josh: I just came back from Venice, and I was shocked by what I saw there.

Martha: I went to Tonle Sap Lake during Chinese New Year, and I also felt stunned by what I witnessed there. Tell me why you had such extreme feelings toward Venice.

Josh: Before I went there, I thought I would see a beautiful floating city with people riding in gondolas*. However, surprisingly, some parts of the city were closed because they were flooded. We ended up only strolling around some streets. So sad! What about your experience in Cambodia?

Martha: Our tour guide took us to one of the floating villages along the Mekong River. We were blown away to see people living on money from fishing only during the dry season. Their houses were built on stilts* because of the rising and falling of the water level. However, frequent flooding during the longer wet season has made fishing very difficult.

Josh: I think the two places we went to are quite similar: Both are threatened by unstable water conditions.

Martha: You can say that again! Maybe we should pay closer attention to these drastic water conditions; otherwise, many places may one day vanish in front of our eyes!

Josh: You bet. We are facing so many natural disasters.
